

Making contact with your now adult adopted child

Information for parents who are searching for and wishing to make contact with the child they placed for adoption

Once you have gone through the process of searching for the child you placed for adoption, you may then decide that you want to make contact. This information sheet will give you some things to think about before making contact, and some guidelines as to how to proceed.

Before deciding to make contact with your now adult child, please carefully consider these questions:

- What are your reasons for wanting contact? (medical / family information only, or possible relationship)
- Who will support you in this process?
- What are your fears and fantasies?
- What do you think may be the other person's experience of the adoption process?
- What are the possible implications for the 'found' person?
- What are the possible implications for your family?
- Who would you tell about your decision to make contact?
- What are your expectations of having contact? Have you considered that these may change after contact has been made?
- Have you considered the possibility that the person you are searching for may not want contact? How will you deal with this?
- Are you able to be sensitive to the other person's feelings, and to try to understand and respect their wishes?
- Are you willing to give the other person as much time as they need to decide about contact with you?
- How do you feel about proceeding with a rate that they are comfortable with?
- How do you feel about ongoing contact?

Sometimes this part of the searching journey can be quite daunting and challenging. When considering the above questions, you may want to talk about these things with family or trusted friends. Or you can make an appointment to speak with someone at Post Adoption Support Services (PASS).

Taking the next step

Some useful advice when thinking about making contact.

It is important to consider that for some adoptees, they may not know they were adopted, and being contacted may be the first time this has come to light. If they have always known, they may have thought about searching over the years, but have had many conflicting thoughts about it and about searching. Being found may also trigger feelings of grief and loss that they are not prepared for.

It is not advisable to just turn up at someone's door. For many people involved in adoption this is one of their greatest concerns. It is possible that an approach made like this could jeopardise any future chances for a relationship to develop.

As the person who is doing the searching, you may have been thinking about making contact for quite some time, whereas the person you are searching for has not had this time to prepare themselves. After the initial contact, further correspondence should go at their pace.

We suggest that initial contact is made via a letter, and often it is better if this letter is sent through an agency such as ours. The staff at PASS are able to help you with this, and can send correspondence on your behalf.

We will send a letter which is very basic and does not mention adoption. This letter will ask the person concerned to contact us. When they do, we will ask them some questions to confirm their identity, and to ensure we have the right person. We will then let them know who is searching for them and why.

Making contact with them in this way allows time for the 'found' person to digest this information and to receive some support.

Depending on the outcome of this, you may then want to exchange letters for a while, and then think about meeting.

PASS run regular support groups for birth mothers, as well as various other seminars and workshops. For further information on these and any other enquiries about PASS services, please contact PASS on PH: (08) 8245 8100, or email on passinfo@rasa.org.au
